One concern that often pops up when it comes to the topic of downloading videos from Facebook or Instagram or any other social media platform is whether or not it is legal to download the videos? There are two sides to it: In dealing with copyright issues, as long as you're downloading a video for your own personal offline use, then you're probably not doing anything illegal. However, we think there should be an exception for commercial uses. IMPORTANT: We do NOT support downloading copyrighted videos of other people to use with commercial intent and that is not what this tool is created for. But in dealing with Google's terms, you'd be straying from Google's original demand if you download videos to watch online. Here's why: Watching videos offline takes money out of Google's pocket. It could also take money off the wallets of the video creators (with an exception for non-monetized videos). Do you wanna know? How to download online videos from any website for free and watch them offline? Video sharing websites run different types of ads, including pre-roll and interruptive ads. That's the way they make money and for some contributors, that's how they make money, too. Google's idea is to serve you with free, super-quality videos while you in turn view or click on ads. If you save videos to watch as an alternative to online, you are not keeping your own end of the bargain. But you have your reasons, right? In some circles, it is more helpful to download a video than go back to the same site repeatedly. For instance, you can save Facebook videos for eLearning purposes. Nowadays, many colleges and universities encourage eLearning and video sharing websites are a very crucial element on that front. You can use a video downloader tool like ours to download eLearning videos and re-watch them as many times as you like, without wasting your data over and over again.
