Also known as hyperhidrosis, excessive sweating is a medical condition that affects an estimated 4.8% of individuals in the United States. Patients with this condition may sweat more than usual in cool weather or in response to stress or emotions such as anger or fear. Generally, hyperhidrosis begins before individuals are twenty-five years old, and patients experience symptoms at least once a week. Sweating associated with this condition may occur for no known reason longer than six months or more, and the patient will sweat frequently on both sides of their body in similar amounts. To diagnose hyperhidrosis, doctors typically rely on the patient’s medical history and a physical exam. Blood and urine tests will probably be done, and some patients will also need to have a starch-iodine or thermoregulatory test. Excessive sweating with no known trigger is often diagnosed as primary focal hyperhidrosis, and patients with this form of the condition more often sweat on hands, feet, submissive and head. If excessive sweating is due to an underlying medical condition, patients are diagnosed with secondary generalized hyperhidrosis. Treatments for both forms include prescription antiperspirants, iontophoresis, botulinum toxin injections, and surgery.
